ARMY RE-ORGANISATION.

A GREAT SCHEME.

LARGE INCREASE OF TROOPS.

SIX ARMY CORPS.

HEAVY FIELD GUNS.

LESS BARRACK DRILL.

ADMINISTRATION DECENTRALISED.

CENTRALISATION OF RESPONSIBILITY.

LONDON, March 9.

Mr. St. John Brodrick, the Secretary of State for War, in the House of Commons last night, unfolded a great scheme for the re-organisation of the army. The scheme has been favourably commented upon by both sides of the House.

The central feature of the scheme is the creation of six army corps, each army corps to have a district.

Each army corps will be completely equipped, and the heavy field guns will be ready to go abroad.

A large portion of the work of the War Office will, under the new scheme, devolve upon the commanders of army corps.

Later, Mr. St. John Brodrick, in the course of his speech, detailing the new army scheme, said that the home army in future would number 680,000 men, including 155,000 additional recruits, besides 115,000 regulars.

The field army would comprise 300,000 men in the home garrisons, and 190,000 volunteers.

For the defence of London there would be 100,000 men, including 40 batteries of heavy artillery.

This distribution, Mr. Brodrick said, would leave unutilised a surplus of 130,000, representing the staff, the sick, and the recruits.

The first three army corps were intended for immediate foreign service or as the first line of home defence.

Commander would be the headquarters of the first corps, Salisbury Plain of the second, Ireland of the third, Colchester of the fourth, York of the fifth, and Edinburgh of the sixth.

The army corps at Colchester, York, and Edinburgh would include 60 battalions of militia and volunteers. Both the militia and the volunteers would have field guns and would have special training.

The equipment of eight regiments for garrison purposes would release an equivalent number of regulars in the Mediterranean garrisons.

The Admiralty, Mr. Brodrick stated, had undertaken the defence of the smaller coastal stations, and thus another five battalions of regulars would be released for home service.

A militia reserve of 60,000 was in course of formation.

The Imperial Yeomanry would be armed with rifles.

If possible the Colonial Yeomanry would be utilised for Imperial service.

Concluding, Mr. Brodrick said that the total addition to the forces would be 128,000 (sic), costing under £2,000,000.

Two hundred 47 field guns had been ordered.

The training of the troops was to be remodelled. There would be less barrack drill. A more professional spirit would be expected to be shown by the officers, whose expenses would be reduced.

Each corps would have its own barracks and manning grounds.

The staff of each corps, the stores, and the transport requirements would be complete as if for active service.

No officer would be employed in a peace command unless certified to be fit to command in war.

The scheme aims at decentralising the responsibility, and centralising the responsibility.

Reuter's Agency states that news has reached Delagoa Bay that Lord Kitchener has granted General Botha an armistice for seven days.

Other reports state that Lord Kitchener and the Boer leaders have been negotiating at Middelburg for several days.

March 9. The Pretoria correspondent of the "Times" in a telegram bearing Wednesday's date reports that the negotiations between General Lord Kitchener and General Louis Botha at Middelburg are in abeyance pending the answer of the Government to the terms proposed.

The correspondent of the "Daily Chronicle" states that General Botha and the majority of his officers have approved of Lord Kitchener's terms, which are—

(1) A general amnesty to those who surrender.

(2) A general amnesty to prisoners except the chief Cape rebels.

(3) The right to help and re-instate those who have been expelled from their farms.

Commandant de Wet and Mr. Steyn are excluded from being able to accept the offer.

Commandant de Wet and Mr. Steyn have replied to General Botha that they are not reconcilable to these terms.

Running fight with de Wet.

Mr. Bennett Burleigh, the war correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph," states that Brigadier-General Plumer on Tuesday night, 1000 men of Commandant de Wet's force, near Fanningham.

Commandant de Wet, as a rule, sent Botham, with 400 men, to trek north. They crossed the Moolder River at Abraham's Kraal on Wednesday.

Commandant de Wet and Mr. Steyn are resting near Springfield, where a concentration of British troops is reported to be proceeding.

The "Times" correspondent, in a report from the headquarters of Lieutenant-Colonel Bethune, dated Wednesday, states that Commandant de Wet, with 700 men, traversed Fauremoot, and went northwards earlier in the week, a few hours in advance of Brigadier-General Plumer and Lieutenant-Colonel Bethune.

A column of Commandant Theron's scouts marked the movements of the Boers, and when Lieutenant-Colonel Bethune reached the Riet River the enemy, with a view of rallying further north, broke and scattered, removing all the blacks and whites likely to furnish information.

The Admiralty, Mr. Brodrick stated, had undertaken the defence of the smaller coastal stations, and thus another five battalions of regulars would be released for home service.

The staff of each corps, the stores, and the transport requirements would be complete as if for active service.

No officer would be employed in a peace command unless certified to be fit to command in war.
